The project focused on the Northeast neighborhood of Wilmington, Delaware. It aims to create a public park in Claymont, DE, bringing a large-scale recreational space to the area. The plan was developed in collaboration with local communities and has led to the protection of coastal waters and the mitigation of storm surge impacts. Carbon sequestration in the Tidewater region is a key focus, highlighting the project's commitment to environmental sustainability.

The project has involved the integration of economic investment strategies, with an emphasis on creating more hospitable environments for residents. A collaboration between the studio and its values, process, and purpose has been facilitated by Dr. Jules Bruck, showcasing past projects of the studio and their impacts on the surrounding communities.

Example work from charrette sessions included the identification of logical locations for economic investment and the sketching of thoughtful designs. Many teams coordinated their designs effectively, and at the end of the flash design block, their work was visually represented. This documentation was crucial in showcasing the project's progress and the collaborative effort involved.

Briley Muldrow, the project leader, aimed to support economic benefits by creating a more vibrant and engaging environment. The project's success is reflected in the increased attractiveness of the area, making it more inviting for its residents.

The Mill Race facilitates education, research, and the encouragement of citizen engagement, fostering a deeper connection between the community and the waterway. Greenbank Mill, for example, is reinvented as a public ruin garden. As Yorklyn redevelops, the abandoned buildings will slowly be integrated into the landscape, preserving the unique sense of place.

Economic benefits come with creating a more hospitable environment, and the project exemplifies this by enhancing the aesthetic and functional aspects of the area. The future of the project is promising, with continued efforts to improve the quality of life for the residents.
